

Stephen Williamson:

Unfortunately, in the busy courts, the crowded courts of the City of New York, the time waiting on the calendar can be lengthy. That's why we try and litigate these cases as effectively and as efficiently and as fast as possible, making sure on the one hand, we leave no stone unturned. But on the other hand, that we waste no time and that we move the cases as quickly as possible because we know that justice delayed is justice denied for our clients. It's a cliché, but it is true.

We have clients who are suffering. They may be disabled, they may be out of work, they may have any number of personal, physical, and economic losses that with each passing month and year are mounting and becoming more and more difficult to shoulder. So the faster we can move these cases and get them onto the trial calendar while getting all the information and evidence that we need to prove the case and win a trial, the better it is for our clients. Because once we're on the trial calendar, like all the other cases, we're waiting a while for the case to actually come up for trial.
