

Speaker 1:

There are times when the police execute what's known as a no-knock warrant on the wrong apartment. When they go into the wrong apartment, in the context of a "no-knock warrant," the effects, the impacts on the people who live in that apartment can be devastated.

Let me explain. When the police are investigating serious crimes, when they're investigating gang activity, when they're investigating drug activity, they will do an investigation and they will ultimately go to a judge and say, "We need to go to this apartment or this premise, this location and we need to arrest persons. We need to confiscate contraband." They will get a warrant and if they do the right thing and they present the right information and evidence to the judge, and they go into the right apartment with the right warrant, then justice is being served and hopefully bad people are being taken off the street.
