

Speaker 1:

My name is Steve Williamson. I'm a lawyer for the little guy, for regular hardworking New Yorkers. People like bus drivers, healthcare workers, teachers, transit workers, union members, tradesmen, and the like. These are the people who build, maintain, and keep our city running, in good times and in bad. When our clients get injured and they can't work like they used to, or they can't work at all, it's a big deal because they can't support themselves or their families. When our clients get injured and they can't do their daily activities, it's a big deal because they can't meet their obligations to themselves or their families. This is especially true when there are young children or elderly parents in the home. Because in our experience, when one of our clients gets hurt, it's an impact on the entire family. So the stakes, they couldn't be higher.

What we try and do for our clients is level the legal playing field. You see, when our clients get injured, it's usually a large corporation, a municipality, or someone represented by a big insurance company who causes the injury. These entities, they're not focused on justice or fairness. Their priority, it's the bottom line. They've got teams of lawyers and investigators working around the clock. They have nearly unlimited resources, and they'll go to great lengths to defeat a claim. Against this, our clients can have a really tough time. They need lawyers at their side with substantial experience, fighting and winning against large corporations and big insurance companies. They need seasoned trial lawyers with the skills, ability, and resolve to get the job done right. You see, regular New Yorkers who work hard and play by the rules, they can't afford to be sidelined by an injury and then see the legal system fail them. They're entitled to have their rights protected. They deserve a fair fight and full justice for all their losses. This is what we do, and this is who we are. The Law Office of Stephen Williamson.
